As one of the more prominent national debates in Scotland during recent years, bigotry and prejudice in professional football are omnipresent themes in newspaper headlines across the country. While high-profile controversies and disorder remain rife in the game, this exciting new title presents a series of eye-opening explorations into the historic relationships between sectarianism and Scottish football, and the extensive ramifications they have for modern society.

Featuring a foreword written by former Scottish First Minister, Lord Jack McConnell, Bigotry, Football and Scotland challenges the received wisdom about sectarianism in Scotland’s national game and in so doing supports efforts to resolve prejudice and promote diversity. Contributors from a wide range of both scholarly and journalistic backgrounds address a number of pertinent issues: How does bigotry affect the wider Scottish population? What plans are in place to try and reverse the negative effect such behaviour has on society? To what degree should governing bodies such as the SFA be held accountable?

Offering analyses through such contexts as gender, class and geography, specific areas covered in the book include:

- Women, Football and Communities
- Sectarianism and Scottish Football: A Rangers Perspective
- ‘They Sing That Song’: Football and Sectarianism in Glasgow during the 1920s and 1930s
- Is Football Bigotry Confined to the West of Scotland? The Heart of Midlothian and Hibernian Rivalry

‘A very welcome contribution to our national understanding’
– Lord Jack McConnell of Glenscorrodale
